Abril de 1960. Orillas del Lago Ness. El ingeniero aeronáutico Tim Dinsdale, investigador del Loch Ness Investigation Bureau (LNIB), oficina encargada de realizar estudios científicos sobre los misteriosos animales acuáticos del lago, filma una corta película que hasta el momento no ha podido ser explicada del todo. Los últimos análisis de la polémica cinta revelan la existencia de grandes organismos subacuáticos en el lago, de varios metros de longitud, que al parecer, por lo mostrado en el celuloide, son capaces de mantener altas velocidades en la superficie del agua, y bajo ella. Ocho años más tarde el profesor D. Gordon Tucker, experto en sónar y presidente y coordinador del Departamento de Electrónica e Ingeniería Eléctrica de la Universidad de Birmingham, Reino Unido, declara en una rueda de prensa: «Los animales detectados por nuestro sónar en 1968 navegaban por debajo del agua a 19 Km/h. Estos objetos animados y móviles, de unos 6 m. de longitud, no podían ser peces. Las rápidas zambullidas y los vertiginosos ascensos subacuáticos realizados por las veloces criaturas anulan esa posibilidad. Ningún ictiólogo o experto en pesquerías ha podido sugerir una especie capaz de tales proezas. Nos sentimos tentados a pensar que son los fabulosos monstruos del lago Ness, ¡observados por vez primera durante sus actividades subacuáticas!». Los informes sobre enormes bestias acuáticas aún por identificar en cientos de lagos del planeta son uno de los enigmas zoológicos más fascinantes en la actualidad. ¿Qué animales se esconden tras los miles de avistamientos? ¿Quiénes han tratado de encontrar a estas esquivas criaturas? ¿Existe realmente el monstruo del Lago Ness? ¿Es posible que un reptil de colosales proporciones sobreviva en aguas prácticamente heladas? ¿Dónde podemos tratar de observarlos?
